WILDFIRE

MARCIA could sense Red's anger when she hired the stranger. But he had good references, the very best when it came to breaking and training horses and she needed a good man on the place. Later when the foreman came to her to complain, she listened patiently. "Miss Marcia, it's always been my job to do the hiring around here. When your pa died, he wanted it that way," said Red Curran. "And now you go hiring a cowpoke nobody knows, without even consulting me." "I'm sorry you weren't consulted, Red," replied Marcia Robbins slowly, "but this man has qualifications we need at the Bar R. He's a rodeo performer and he's agreed to ready Wildfire for the rodeo opening and also to ride him for the Bar R Ranch. If he wins, the purse will bring me the money I need for that payment on the ranch. And you know how very much we need that money." Red looked interested at her explanation, but he loped away without further comment.

The pretty girl's brow wrinkled with worry as she thought of the state things were in. When her father died two years earlier, the ranch had been thriving. Since then she'd been the victim of wholesale cattle rustling, with the thieves backing huge stock trucks up to the edge of her range lands and simply driving the steers in, to be carted off and sold under another brand. Red had posted sentries and the sheriff had organized several posses, but the thieves were too crafty, they seemed to know when to strike. Now the final payment on the Bar R was coming due and she didn't have the money to pay it. The Bar R was a good spread and many a rancher had tried to buy it from her but she clung to her home tenaciously. Her only hope was in making an entry in the rodeo for the Bar R. Red had quit riding two years before, claiming that an old knee injury bothered him, so he couldn't be counted on to bring in the prize money. Now Marcia's hopes were pinned on Brad Tucker, and the bucking, fighting, untrained roan, Wildfire.

Her thoughts were interrupted as Brad Tucker walked up to her, "My gear is all set ma'am," he said. "I'd like to have a look at Wildfire now." She was startled out of her thoughtfulness. "Oh, yes," she said. "I'll take you down. Red's busy in the stable. I guess you've noticed, Brad, that our foreman didn't take it kindly when I hired you." He laughed a little, "Yes, that didn't take much imagination. I'm surprised he doesn't approve of you hiring a rodeo man, though, Miss Marcia. I can recall that Red Curran was a top rodeo name a few years back. He represented your father successfully in all the big shows." Marcia nodded, thoughtfully, "Well, maybe it's sour grapes. He claims an old knee injury keeps him out of the rodeos now and I guess he misses his share of the prize money." They had reached the corral and Wildfire was seen as he was rarely seen, grazing quietly. Brad whistled softly as he viewed the beautiful horse.

Brad Tucker worked daily with Wildfire. Marcia arranged for him to be exempted from all other ranch work so he could concentrate on training the handsome stallion. Red Curran smoldered under this usurpation of his authority, but he had little to say to Tucker, though many times, Marcia observed him watching carefully as Brad patiently put the horse through his paces.

Finally the rodeo announcements began to appear all over the countryside and there was wide-spread talk about the reappearance of the Phantom Rider. He was the winner in the big rodeo the year before with a black stallion that stole the show. But he refused to give his name or show his face and the fact that he was scheduled to appear again this year, caused many of the more timid entries to drop out. Marcia asked Brad how he felt about competing against the Phantom Rider. "It doesn't make much difference who enters, Miss Marcia," replied Brad confidently. "With Wildfire, I'm sure we can win for the Bar R and then all your worries will be over." "Maybe they'll just be beginning," interrupted Red as he came around the side of the house. "You sound pretty cocky for a man who's going to compete with the Phantom Rider. I'll be up in those stands watching with interest, Tucker." And he turned on his heel and walked away.

From then on, Brad slept in the stable near Wildfire, but he didn't mention his suspicions to Marcia Robbins because he knew she believed Red's attitude was because he could no longer ride in the shows. Brad's watchfulness paid off two nights before the rodeo when he was awakened by someone stealthily creeping up on him. He was lying on his back, his eyes almost closed when the man bent over him. Through his lashes, Brad could see that he was masked and he held a knife. Without hesitating further, he suddenly drew back his knees and booted the intruder violently. He flew backwards, cursing, but had regained his feet by the time Brad was up. In the fight that followed, Brad was doing all right until a crack on the head came from behind. He sagged out of the picture. He came to, a short while later, trussed up with ropes and lying out by the corral. He was frantic because he could hear faint movements in the stable and he was afraid of what the invaders might do to Wildfire. He didn't want to shout and attract their attention so he whinnied, plaintively and long. Brad called on a childhood hobby of animal imitations to attract Marcia Robbins' attention. He recalled her interest in Wildfire and he hoped against hope that if she heard the sounds she'd come to the corral to see if Wildfire were out at this late hour. His attempts were rewarded moments later, when clad in a robe, Marcia came hurrying out to the corral. He attracted her attention and as she excitedly released him, he told her what had happened in the stable. They reached it in time to see a man about to plunge a hypodermic into the flanks of Wildfire, while another masked man held tightly to the reins to steady the nervous horse. Brad didn't wait to get a gun, he dived for the man about to injure the horse. The fight was more even after he tossed the man's gun to Miss Marcia and she trained it on the entire group. It didn't take long to unmask Red Curran, nor to extricate a full confession of cattle rustling under the threat of a further beating. He was turned in to the sheriff along with the members of his gang.

Brad rode Wildfire in the Big Rodeo and won for the Bar R. The phantom rider didn't appear, he was resting in jail, contemplating his broken plans of winning the prize money and of breaking Marcia Robbins as a ranch owner and taking over the Bar R spread for his own. Wildfire is now one of the most famous rodeo horses in the west and the prosperous Bar R has a new foreman.
